

Michael Kelly

"My job has me split between about 5 projects at a time. How am I supposed to remember what stage each is left at?"

Age: 36
Occupation: Full stack developer
Location: Gateshead, Newcastle
Status: Single
Phone type: iPhone 5s
Computer skills: 10/10

Laid back

Intelligent

Organised

Interests

- Building flying drones
- Watching TV
- Discussing technology
- Playing computer games
- Making youtube videos

Goals

- Retain details of projects
- Keep lists of todo's on him at all times
- Quickly reference lists without any hassle

Frustrations

- Having adverts pop up whilst trying to make a todo list
- Slow applications that needlessly waste time

About

Michael has always been a fan of technology. He grew up in a small town just outside London before moving to Manchester to complete a Computer Sciences degree at University. After qualification, Michael travelled further north to obtain a job at an industry leading software development company.

Since joining the development team, Michael has learned a lot and has turned into a bit of a handyman around the office. He works on around 5 different projects at any one time and regularly moves around the offices to collaborate with different teams. Doing this isn't an easy task, Michael has to co-ordinate himself effectively and manage his time well to get his work done.

To keep organised, Michael keeps a list of things he needs to do on his desktop at work, but often finds that when he moves about the office he has to waste time logging in and out of computers to reference his list. Michael wishes he had access to an application that could be opened quickly and contained all his project details and reminders as to what needs done next!

Michael has often tried downloading list applications from the app store for his phone but finds that they are either too slow, not possessing the functions he requires or filled with adverts!